

A Demonstration

By DOROTHEA HALL

ENCK Alnaworth, a young American with a rich and indulgent father, spent much of his time abroad, Paris being theaters. Indeed, they were his erid. One night on the stage of the pers Comique he saw his fate. One ecorums, of oil that is gentle and fem-and introduce him to the lady. This young man, Guily, greeted, and Almsworth said Miss Verdier the same shy, unassuming creature she was on the stage. She was rather petite and dressed off and usually on the stage in very simple attire, her hair especially being plainly done. When Almsworth looked at her admiringly her eyes dropped to the floor and she stood before him a living statue of innocence.

At the end of a few minutes, during which Almsworth gave Miss Verdier all of his time that she was able to spare of her own to be with him, he fumed himself desperately in love with her and made her a proposal of marriage. It was accepted, and Almsworth was inordinately happy. He told his father that it would not be necessary for her to remain in the house—that his father was a very rich man.

but he had always been very liberal with his son and had told the boy that when he wished to marry he would

Dick wrote his father about his acceptance, and his father replied sympathetically. "I don't see the description he has received of the way you would be would have no objective whatever to the match and would provide for the couple liberally. The elder A'ns-worth was a widower with no other child except Dick, and he promised to take care of his son and his boy on that day of his marriage. "I would be said in closing the letter, 'I must make the acquaintance of your fiancée before giving my approval, and I am sure in the say I shall not be able to resist the ocean for several months yet.'"

"This last part of his father's letter was the only part of it that interfered with Dick's comfort. He was very much in love and desired to be made happy at once. It troubled him that he was not a modest young Christian should continue to be the target for the eyes of the young bloods of Paris. He would gladly have had her leave it at

At last he received the welcome news that Mr. Amesworth would sail on a certain date and go direct to Paris on his arrival at Havre. Dick waited for the day of arrival feverishly. He had no doubt of his father's approval of his ladylove. Such unaffected sweetness would charm any

On the day of his father's expected arrival Dek received a telegram from him inviting his son to sup with him at a cafe on the Champs Elysees. Mr. Shaslow would not arrive before 10 p. m., and his son was to go to the case at 11. At the appointed hour Dick went to the cafe and asked for his father. The proprietor announced that M. Alsworth had engaged a private room, but that he had evidently been detained, since he had not yet arrived.

Dick impatiently walked back and forth for an hour, when a waiter stepped up to him and bade him follow him. He led the young man to an upper story and, stopping at a certain

The Might young Aleworth beheld startled him. Around a table on which were the remains of a supper sat a company of men and women all the worse for wine. But this was only the beginning of what Dick saw. At one end sat his father, evidently the host, with the crowning feature of the scene was a woman dancing around the feast's board.

"My son," said the elder Alnoworth, "demonstration is better than persuasion. I have been a long while in

And that was the end of Dick Almsworth's dream of love—at least this dream. He had another later, but this time his father approved of his choice as soon as he saw her.
